Fund. Since then, his herd has grown to nearly 50 animals.

"I would suggest starting out small, and growing as you can," Tucker said. "There's a lot of resources out there for veterans."

Tucker always looks for ways to help out other veterans. He encourages others to get involved in agriculture as he sees many skills that translate well from the military to agriculture. Tucker grew up on his family's dairy farm, so he has a background in farming.

"The discipline of the military transfers well into your day-to-day farming operation. You get things done. Somebody who has never been in the military or didn't grow up on a farm, they may not really know what that means," said Tucker. "Your work ethic from the military also needs to transfer over into farming, and I think that is a lot easier for veterans to do."

Tucker is one of the Farm Veteran Coalition's many success stories. He also utilizes the "Homegrown by Heroes" label on his beef, which was created by FVC to show consumers that his product is veteran-grown and produced.

"We are definitely very proud of Justin Tucker," said Michael O'Gorman, Executive Director of the Farmer Veteran Coalition. "He tracked me down and said that he was back from Iraq and all he wanted to do was farm now, and how can we help him? And we have

O'Gorman looks forward to the opportunities that the newly formed state chapter will bring to veterans looking for a fresh start. There's even a New York Veterans in Agriculture Conference on Nov. 29 in Syracuse for veterans looking to network with other veterans and learn more about the many opportunities in agriculture. Those interested can contact Dean Koyanagi at 607-255-9911 or drk5@cornell.edu for more information.

"Less than one percent of our population serves in the military and about one percent serves in agriculture, so both groups are really unique. They both like to take on something difficult, take on something that has a larger purpose, and they have a willingness to face all of the challenges that comes with that," O'Gorman said.
